Those tones which are easily affected are called negative, or, better, passive colors. The tones not found in the spectrum (namely, white, the grays, and black) may be called the passive colors, and those tones found in the spectrum may be called the active colors. But these are relative terms also, for some of the spectrum colors are more active than others, and tints and shades sometimes receive qualities as readily as grays. Drill Exercises. --Have pupils select from papers and other colored objects a warm green and a cool green, a warm blue and a cool blue, a warm violet and a cool violet, etc. Compare the greens of leaves, the violets of asters, etc. Compare the grays of tree trunks, of pebbles, of clouds. Cut 2 squares of various colors and place squares of neutral gray upon them. Substitute J squares of warm gray; squares of cool gray. Determine the most active standard; the most passive gray. What changes in quality occur Select two active colors which will make a warm gray appear neutral, and two which will make a cool gray appear neutral. Select two active colors which will make a neutral gray appear warm, and two more which will make it appear cool. Page 23. Effects of Juxtaposition. --a. Draw margin lines. 6.
