Excerpt: .should substitute for the term I used just now J For the misplaced expression I Louisa, returned her father, it appears to me that nothing can be plainer. Confining yourself rigidly to Fact, the question of Fact yo- state to yourself is: Does Mr. Bounderby ask me to marry hhn 1 Yes, he does. The sole remaining question then is: Shall I marry him? I think nothing can be plainer than that. Shall I marry hhn I repeated Louisa, with great deliberation. Precisely. And it is satisfactory to me, as your father, my dear Louisa, to know that you do not come to the consideration of that question with the previous habits of mind, and habits of life, that belong to many young women. No, father, she returned, I do not. I now leave you to judge for yourself, said Mr. Gradgrind. I have stated the case, as such cases are usually stated among practical minds; I have stated it, as the case of your mother and myself was stated in its time. The rest, my dear Louisa, is for you to decide. From the beginning, she had sat looking at him fixedly. As he now leaned back in his chair, and bent his deep-set eyes upon her in his turn, perhaps he might have seen one wavering moment in her, when she was impelled to throw herself upon his breast, and give him the pent-up confidences of her heart. But, to see it, he...
